

WHEN BRYCE'S MOM WALKS OUT on her abusive boyfriend and back into jail for breaking her probation, he's left facing the summer before his junior year with no parents, no phone, and only the clothes on his back.

With nowhere to call home, Bryce crashes at his grandparents' house on the Wolf Creek Reservation. Wolf Creek is full of memories and old friends—including Robbie and Mikayla, who hang out at the local skate park.

Skateboarding reminds Bryce of his late dad: carefree, riding like he could fly. If Bryce could learn to ride like that, he'd take his crew to the top of the skateboarding championship at the end of the summer and finally prove he's not a loser, especially to the online-famous, captivating Mikayla. Summer is looking up, even as he's falling on his face.

But when a fresh loss takes Bryce down, he'll need to learn to lean on his Ojibwe community to get back on the board. Only then can he discover his father's real legacy—and the true meaning of unconditional love.

Award-winning author Byron Graves (Ojibwe and Lakota) tells the unforgettable story of a gifted young athlete learning to ride in his father's footsteps.

BYRON GRAVES is Ojibwe and Lakota and was born and raised on the Red Lake Indian Reservation in Minnesota. When they aren't writing, they can be found playing retro video games, leveling up in skateboarding, and spending time with their family. Rez Ball was their debut novel; Medicine Wheels is their second book.
